did you feel it?

Oh My Dear God – Are You One of Those Single Tear People?
:'(

Jammie Nicholas

Essay – April 2, 2016

This is about the moment you realize that a single tear has formed and is cascading down your cheek. This isn't about the act of crying or the emotions associated with tears. This is about the single tear, :'(. This isn't about the other tears, the ones that come after the :'(has been shed. This is about the image of a :'(, the moment that forms that image, and its subsequent abstractions and permutations in popular culture. This isn't about feeling but rather the realization of feeling a feeling. This is about the baggage attached to an image and what is potentially transferred when this image is viewed. This isn't about what is felt but rather that it is felt. This is asking whether ubiquitously understood images can mean something anymore. This essay is part of the Open! COOP Academy series 'did you feel it?' [www.onlineopen.org/did-you-feel-it]
Barack Obama, November 2008.

Do you remember the first time that you saw someone shed a :'(? My first memory of seeing a :'(running down a cheek was projected on screen in a darkened cinema, whilst sitting next to my mother, watching The Lion King not long after its theatrical release in 1994. At the base of an echoing canyon, a lion cub turns toward the audience, and a :'(cascades down his right cheek. This :'(is followed by others and over his shoulder the body of his father can be seen motionless. His tears are accompanied by his calls for help and the choral and orchestral soundtrack. In answer to the title question, everyone is a :'(person, or at least I bet from where you are standing, they look like they are. I can't remember the last time that I actually shed a :'(but yesterday I did text someone a :'(.

Throughout this essay I will trace the journey of the :'(, along my personal chronology of my experience of images of a :'(against its broader development, starting with Disney, followed by Hollywood films and mass media's constructed personas and ending with the emergence of the emoji as a cultural phenomenon. The trajectory of the :'(more or less follows the four stages of Jean Baudrillard's argument in Simulation and Simulacra (1981): from a faithful image copy, to a perverted unfaithful copy that hints at an obscure reality, to the image pretending to be a faithful copy without any reference to an original and then to the image being lost in a dispersive abyss of abstraction and simulation. However, in our hyper-contemporary situation I intend to show that there is now the potential that a ubiquitously recognized image has entered another level of signification, where the image, in our case the :'(, has the potential to mean, in a more fluid and malleable sense than before, a part of something, the whole of something, and everything in between, simultaneously. And now more than ever, it is up to us to pull the :'(from the dispersive abyss and to decide each and every time what that something might be.

A :'(can be described as an image of a close-up of the face, typically cropped at the mid-forehead so that the eyes are located three quarters of the way up the image vertically and centred horizontally, with the face covering one third of the composition. The :'(can be shed from either eye with the tear itself generally paused mid-cascade, with the downward trail clearly visible.

The Actual Event

There is always that specific moment when you realize that you have shed a :'(. That one, specific, salty crystal droplet cascading down your cheek before all the others do. That tear that reifies everything that occurred before and also what will happen afterward.

Disney Tears (First Exposure)

One of the first times Mickey Mouse cries is during a spotlit violin recital in a black and white short animation called Just Mickey (or Fiddlin' A[...]).[1] Twice, as he bows that long single note during Johannes Brah[...]e no. 5,' a :'(rolls down his cheek and falls to the floor. Subsequent[...]lmed with emotion, and a flood of tears fall from his face. He has [...] eturns to finish with a dramatic, crowd-pleasing encore.[2] Micke[...]t there is more to come – specifically in this case, tears – and re[...]ctive response to a stimulus. This :'(acts as a straight representation of the human emotive response and what we can learn is that Mickey has feelings too. What comes after, leaving the stage followed by a triumphant return, becomes a narrative element, often repeated, throughout the history of Disney animation, all triggered by a :'(.
There are a lot of :'(in Disney. As with Mickey's first tears they act as narrative indicators or visual signs of more to come. But rather than indicators of more tears, the :'(signal morphs into a visual indicator that a character is undergoing an unknown and larger, emotional transition. This earlier physical transition is illustrated unfiltered in The Ugly Duckling and Beauty and the Beast.[3] [4] In later iterations, this process of transition becomes less physical and more psychological as the broader narrative of the :'(evolves, to become a sign of the experience of emotion, or more exactly, the sign of feeling a feeling.

Disney films are inherently educational and formative for children, who watch these films repeatedly and take them at face value. [5] One of the base lessons that a majority of children's animated films teach is the notion of death, and more specifically the notion of the traumatic loss of a parental figure. [6] It is at the precise moment of the realization of this loss that the :'(is shed. The :'(acts as the visible material residue shed at the threshold of an emotional state change and, with the coupling of the traumatic loss, the :'(becomes the signal of a precognitive and unconscious occurrence. The Lion King, [7] the first time I remember seeing a :'(shed, is the most poignant and complete example.

After the tragic death of Mufasa at the hands of his brother and a rampant wildebeest stampede, Simba tries to find life in the limp lion carcass. [8] Dejected, he turns away from the body and is overcome with the traumatic realization that everything will now be his, [9] and sheds a :'(. He sheds this :'(not only because of the traumatic loss of his father but also because of his realization that something has changed, a change that, especially in North American cinema, must be addressed through triumphant catharsis. Therefore we are able to say that in Disney films a :'(is not the sign for a single event but rather the sign of both the realization of an unconscious transition and, simultaneously, an impending catharsis that will attempt to close the rupture that caused it.
Young Simba, The Lion King, film still, directed by Roger Allers and Rob Minkoff, Walt Disney Pictures, Los Angeles, 1994.

Both the transitional and impending secondary events signal a chasm that continually widens through the repeated animated abstraction of representing something that in itself, is inherently incapable of being encapsulated by an image. The :'(and its affective baggage is continually presented and utilized as an innocent attempt to tether a fabricated character narrative back to a human emotive response. However, its repetitional usage transforms it from a faithful representation or visual synonym into a sign of an obscured reality. Throughout the history of Disney films, the :'(is an abstracted and constructed visual metonym, where the :'(is employed as a surrogate representation of an emotional state change; a child audience with blind faith in the image would believe this attempt to tether to something, is real. With this formative exposure, the unquestioned image of a :'(remains ingrained as a faithful and affect-filled synonym copy rather than the perverted, abstracted and unfaithful metonym that it has become.

Sign of Emotion or Hollywood's Suture, it's a Trope!

The earliest example of a :'(in cinema appears in Carl Theodor Dreyer's 1928 silent film The Passion of Joan of Arc. [10] It predates Mickey's tearful moment by two years but follows the same trajectory as an indicator not only of more tears to follow, but also of the realization of an emotional rupture that must be addressed. It is the first celluloid copy of the :'(as a pictorial representation of an affective, human emotive response.

Reneé Jeanne Falconetti, The Passion of Joan of Arc, film still, directed by Carl Theodor Dreyer, Société Générale des Films, Paris, 1927–1928.

The silent film is almost exclusively composed of close-ups of faces, giving a detailed presentation of the trial of Joan of Arc, with biographical and contextual information presented as text plates. Within this structure and composition, each scene contains historic information and something that exceeds the boundaries of the frame, something that visually cannot be conveyed. Gilles Deleuze defines an 'affection-image' in Cinema 1: The Movement Image specifically as a close-up of the face. [11] He describes The Passion of Joan of Arc as 'the affective film par excellence,' which we can appreciate through its almost exclusively close-up composition. This construction, especially when coupled with the later permutations of the :'(that we have seen in Disney films, is the composition that prevails in and is referenced throughout cinema. The image of the :'(in The Passion of Joan of Arc is the foundation of all :'(that have and will be shed and here the affection-image acts as a visual synonym. It is this image of a :'(as a visual synonym, which is utilized and copied in an attempt to impart both that the character has felt something beyond the pictorial representation of the frame and that we too as viewers should feel this something too. Importantly, as the origin, it retains (at least a part of) its signification and affective power, whereas each celluloid copy moves further away from the genuine emotional reaction and into the virtual.

It is the shedding of Reneé Jeanne Falconetti's :'(in The Passion of Joan of Arc that causes the dual chasm of the realization of passing a threshold and importantly the distancing abstraction of representation to open. [12] From this moment on, Hollywood utilizes the :'(as its own medical suture, in an attempt to stitch together these ruptures. By employing the :'(Hollywood scrambles to retain Falconetti's initial celluloid images' affective power and present it repackaged in a myriad of permutations to the viewer, [13] before it is lost in the dispersive abyss of abstraction and simulation. Each reiteration of Falconetti's :'(blurs the absence of a reference to any profound reality and meaning of the :'(, dispersing any claim to originality of those that came before. This initially leaves the image of :'(to only pretend that it means something and increasingly negates even the need to pretend. The use of the :'(is meant to ensure that we ourselves realize that those represented on screen are, and more importantly, that they actually feel too, with the slow cascade of a :'(once again pulling at our heart strings. If only for a moment, and through familiarity, we see that they do what we do, and, because of the :'(, we are told that we should feel it too. Every celluloid copy imitates and helplessly gropes toward Falconetti's :'(, and with every permutation, every :'(precedes the original, and as we have seen with Simba's :'(, replaces any authority of the original.

The zenith of the :'(use in Hollywood can be said to have come in the form of Denzel Washington as Private Trip in the [image obscured] [15] Washington's :'(was awarded an Oscar, with Hollywood congra[...]ricated ingenuity; in essence the :'(has become a self-sustaining t[...] no longer a visual synonym or a sign of a genuine event, but a sim[...]ttempt to tether what is inherently a fabricated character narrative back to an actual event, instead, through myriad filmic examples, roots the image of a :'(as an abstracted and constructed representation and pushes it further and further into the virtual realm.
The 1998 blockbuster film Armageddon serves as a clear illustration of Hollywood's tropic use of a :'(as a suture attempting and failing to sew up this duel chasm. In the film, Bruce Willis and Liv Tyler's shared :'(situates the father-daughter relationship as an encapsulation of the Disney-like realization of parental loss; in this case the triumphant catharsis comes in the form of Willis's sacrificial saving of the Earth.[16]

Liv Tyler and Bruce Willis, film stills, Armageddon, directed by Michael Bay, Buena Vista Pictures, Los Angeles, 1998.

The video transmission of Willis's face fills every single screen in mission control, screens which would normally be used to transfer information and data.[17] Everybody in the room is immediately implicated as participants in the intimate moment between father and daughter via this multi-screen broadcast. This proliferation of Willis shedding a :'(openly presents the image as fabricated character in the narrative, implying that the supposed shared intimacy between it and the viewer is not an intimacy between it and you, but it and anyone. This thrusts the :'(further into a virtual realm, ignoring the viewer and leaving us aside to exist in the abyss of abstraction and simulacra. The suture that had attempted to tether the :'(to something real has been cut and instead it is released into its own virtual self-referential information system.

The unrepresentable feeling of a feeling and the abstracted animated representation of the something that exceeds the boundaries of the frame, is set across a narrative analogy in the form of the void of space, which in itself becomes a tertiary representation and reference of the dual chasm that a :'(heralds. Via the interface of a satellite communication, their shared :'(is presented as the suture between them. A shared moment of intensity and intimacy tethered across the spatial void between two bodies.

Armageddon completes the :'(transformation from a visual metonym to a broken visual reference. The :'(and its affective power is no longer felt between the narrative and the viewer, only observed. The image is broken. There is only simulation. We, as the viewers, are no longer invited to experience the :'(and the rupture of an actual event that it references. Rather we are presented with an image of the image that no longer signifies the feeling of a feeling that we too can feel; in short, the :'(no longer means.

The image of the :'(has shed its signifying and affective power and oversentimentally ensues. After they both have shed a :'(, Tyler reaches out to physically connect with her character's father but instead, she is confronted with a cold, white noise-filled screen. Her fingers linger on the glass screen, which hermetically seals any tangible connection with on. We are watching the loss of a connection, the loss of any affective etween two bodies, only for a flickering moment does a virtual simulation of a vent remain. There is nothing left beyond the boundaries of the frame, and a :'(has become empty and is used and broadcast freely, without signification and only as information, by anyone and everyone, anywhere, on any glass screened device.
The :'(can at this point be seen to have become totally meaningless and it is no longer genuine or real. The :'(is just a broken sign without any reference to an original and therefore it remains as a simulation of what it once was sutured to. The immediacy and urgency of how to represent the feeling of a feeling in an online, virtual, yet connected realm is what is at stake now in our hyper-contemporary situation.

Synecdoche, :'(

A mascara-filled :'(cascades down the cheek of Lauren Conrad, an American reality television personality from the MTV programme The Hills. Prior to airing, the production team manipulated the footage, slowing the time frame, a technique used in reality television and increasingly television in general to prolong the potential affect caused by the :'(in both the characters and the viewers. At its broadcast it remained an image which was still lost in its own fabrication, suffocating itself in the abyss of simulation. That is until her :'(became one of the most famous and reposted examples of the :'(online. Its ubiquitousness is rooted in the form of myriad continually repeating GIFs, less than a second in duration.

There are a lot of :'(on the Internet, not fresh ones, but ones that have already been shed.[18] The reemergence and recycling of previous examples of the :'(, are continually sourced from film, television, animation, and digitized printed material, and are then shared, reedited, reframed, compressed, downloaded, uploaded, annotated, abstracted, and clipped from their original contexts. This digital afterlife of :'(images often takes form as user-generated, never-ending, always looping GIFs and as static, low-quality JPEGs, more generally described as poor images. [19] [20] The employment by Internet users of these digital rehashes of :'(are used as simulated attempts, like the Disney films they once watched as children, to express oneself in the only way possible. The now ubiquitously recognizable image, and what the :'(supposedly refers to, is employed in exactly the same way as in the Hollywood films they watch. By embedding a digital copy of a :'(, Internet users are telling everyone, like like you and me, from their own fabricated online character narratives and comment threads, that they really feel things too. These fleeting attempts to connect and incite affect in both themselves and others, across the void of an online, virtual, yet connected realm, for all intents and purposes remain disembodied; these attempts act as redundant neon signs on storefronts or flea markets pointing you toward something that is no longer there.

On 3 November 2008, then presidential nominee Senator Barack Obama shed a :'(while on stage at a campaign rally in Charlotte, North Carolina. The image that was broadcast around the world, via printed and online media and shared via peer to peer social media, is a cropped close-up image of the face, the eyes located three quarters of the way up the image, with a :'(caught mid-cascade down the cheek. His :'(was shed on the evening before Election Day and according to international media due to the strains of a presidential campaign but more importantly, the recent loss of his grandmother. With that the Disney-like emotional rupture present with a :'(was complete. [21] In addition, the broadcast and shared image precisely follows the composition of Falconetti's affective :'(, in all the various crons. Whether Obama's :'(was utilized as an excellent piece of las_____fortuitous and serendipitous incident, the following catharsis o_____hant election as the first black president of the United States of Am_____ Even though Obama's :'(was not the first or last time that a political figure or popular culture in general has employed the :'(, what we can see is the becoming of a :'(once again as a signifier of meaning, or rather the image of a :'(being capable of galvanizing meaning. Here the meaning may not necessarily be the meaning that was intended, or even a genuine meaning or emotive reaction itself, but the avatar-like utilization of :'(images in constructed narrative structures. What this illustrates is our entrance into a further stage of the image of a :'(: one informed by computing, avatars, constructed personas, celebrity and pluralistic ignorance, where there is meaning attached to the :'(, but the meaning is itself fluid and malleable. Each and every time it is redeployed, its meaning is reapplied, drawing upon everything and anything, from the actual event, to any specific example of a :'(, to the whole notion of a :'(each and every time that it is viewed, accessed and or activated. It is your/our choice to decide what it means.

The :'(as a freely shared and digitally deployed, disembodied narrative tool, spills forward from Internet forum repositories as latent, compound, text- and character-based images (ASCII) into the immediacy of social media connectivity. This spillage comes via online messaging services, such as AOL and MSN Messenger among others, to mobile instant messaging with the evolution of the :'(as stand-alone pictured emojis, especially since their inclusion as a standard keyboard option on many mobile devices' operating systems. [22] The reification of the :'(has been accelerated through the introduction to, exponential growth and throwaway nature of the emoji and image sharing as a communication tool for our online personas and narratives. [23]

Crying Face, Apple iOS 9.1, released 27 October 2015.

An image of a :'(may no longer be tethered to what was an originary original or even an original copy, as its meaning has now become fluid, dependent on each and every digital deployment. Similarly, rather than being untethered from any meaning, it is possible to see that there is indeed a return to a ubiquitous pictorial meaning and the potential of affect. The :'(is no longer directly related to a :'(being shed by someone somewhere, on the other side of a hermetically sealed glass screen, along with the affective baggage it once signified. The :'(, through the coexistence of a polyphony of distinct variations, citations and meanings for each user and or viewer and for each time that it is deployed, viewed, accessed and or activated, has itself become a synecdoche and we are free to interpret it in any of the variations that it can be seen or felt.

The :'(has been pulled out of the dispersive abyss of abstraction and simulation. The :'(meaning is no longer rigid, as it was in early cinematic examples, nor is it merely left as reflection of a proliferation of other :'(. Once bereft of meaning, the :'(now exists in a new synecdoche circulation, within a heteroglossia of fluid and malleable meaning that can be freely called upon, by both user and viewer, as a part or whole of the notion of a :'(. This allows the continual retethering and resuturing of :'(in every multiple and singularity. Once again the :'(can evoke the occurrence of something solely beyond the parameters of the presented frame, which has the potential for an affective movement between two (disem)bodies. This ubiquitously recognized and shared image, even if it is the bastardized and digitized offspring of an original, is affectively powerful once again.

Do you remember that :'(I sent to someone yesterday? I let my fingers linger on the touch screen, over those three undulating dots, hoping for a tangible connection. They text me back the next day, the words read: 'what's up you okay?'
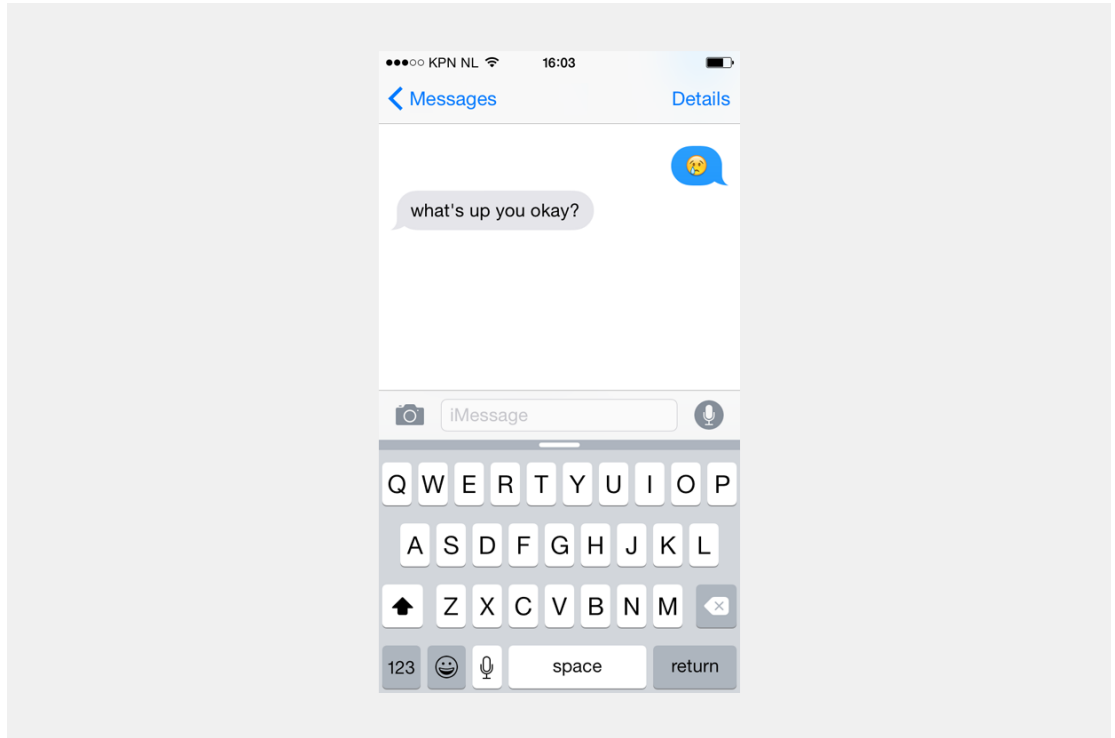

Jammie Nicholas (1987, UK) is an artist, occasional curator and occasional writer. He is currently studying at the Dutch Art Institute (DAI, MFA ArtEZ, Arnhem) and likes the nuances of things.

Footnotes

1. Just Mickey, alternatively titled Fiddlin' Around, directed by Walt Disney, Walt Disney Productions, Los Angeles, 1930.
2. See Just Mickey, www.youtube.com The first :'(occurs at 03:19 min. and the second at 03:40 min.
3. The Ugly Duckling, directed by Jack Cutting, Walt Disney Productions, Los Angeles, 1939.
4. Beauty and the Beast, directed by Gary Trousdale and Kirk Wise, Walt Disney Pictures, Los Angeles, 1991.
5. See Ian Coleman et al., 'CARTOONS KILL: casualties in animated recreational theater in an objective observational new study of kids' introduction to loss of life,' BMJ (16 December 2014): www.bmj.com.
6. Ibid.
7. The Lion King, directed by Roger Allers and Rob Minkoff, Walt Disney Pictures, Los Angeles, 1994.
8. See www.youtube.com A :'(happens at 02:52 min.
9. See www.youtube.com.Mufasa: "Look, Simba. Everything the light touches is our kingdom." – Young Simba: "Wow." – Mufasa: "A king's time as ruler rises and falls like the sun. One day, Simba, the sun will set on my time here, and will rise with you as the new king. – Young Simba: "And this'll all be mine?" – "Mufasa: Everything."
10. The Passion of Joan of Arc, directed by Carl Theodor Dreyer, Société Générale des Films, Paris, 1927–1928.
11. See Gilles Deleuze, Cinema 1: The Movement Image (Paris: Èditions de Minuit, 1983).
12. Threshold is a key term in Brian Massumi's theories on affect. He uses it to describe the two-way relationship inherent in affect but also a proverbial threshold that, in being affected, one irrevocably steps over. 'When you affect something, you are opening yourself up to being affected in turn, and in a slightly different way than you might have been the moment before. You have made a transition, however slight. You have stepped over a threshold. Affect is this passing of a threshold, seen from the point of view of the change in capacity.' Brian Massumi, The Power at the End of the Economy, (Durham: Duke University Press, 2015), 103.
13. A few examples: Pinocchio, a wooden puppet in Pinocchio, directed by Ben Sharpsteen and Hamilton Luske, Walt Disney Pictures, Los Angeles, 1940; Molly Jensen in Ghost, directed by Jerry Zucker, Paramount Pictures, Los Angeles, 1990; Racheal, a humanoid replicant in Blade Runner, directed by Ridley Scott, Warner Brothers, Los Angeles, 1982; and Arwen Undómiel, an elf maiden in Lord of the Rings: The Fellowship of the Ring, directed by Peter Jackson, New Line Cinema, Los Angeles, 2001.
14. Glory, directed by Edward Zwick, TriStar Pictures, Los Angeles, 1989.
15. See www.youtube.com.
16. Armageddon, directed by Michael Bay, Buena Vista Pictures, Los Angeles, 1998.
17. See www.youtube.com.
18. During my research into the :'(the vast majority of examples that I have found have been readily available uploads easily found online, even if I had already seen the images in other formats.
19. Hito Steyerl, 'In Defence of the Poor Image,' e-flux journal 10 (November 2009): www.e-flux.com.
20. See secondary filming of the :'(from Glory, 1989, www.youtube.com.
21. See 'Obama's grandmother dies before U.S. Election Day,' Xinhua, 3 November 2008, news.xinhuanet.com.
22. For more on emoji as language see Anna Doble, 'UK's fastest growing language is… Emoji,' BBC Newsbeat, 19 May 2015, www.bbc.co.uk and Alex Clark, 'Emoji: the first truly global language?,' Guardian, 31 August 2014, www.theguardian.com.
23. The crying face emoji was approved as part of Unicode 6.0 in 2010.

Crosslinks

'did you feel it?': www.onlineopen.org/did-you-feel-it

Tags

Aesthetics, Affect, Image